

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

Vandalist.com.au

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

Vandalist.com.au

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

Vandalist.com.au

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

|    |    |    |    |
|----|----|----|----|
| 10 | 8  | 16 | 1  |
| 9  | 13 | 6  | 15 |
| 3  | 14 | 11 | 2  |
| 5  | 12 | 7  | 4  |

Vandalist.com.au

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

Vandalist.com.au

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

|    |    |    |    |
|----|----|----|----|
| 11 | 10 | 12 | 5  |
| 2  | 16 | 9  | 14 |
| 6  | 4  | 13 | 3  |
| 8  | 15 | 7  | 1  |

Vandalist.com.au

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

Vandalist.com.au

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?

Shared Corporate Kitchen Space Bingo

Vandalist.com.au

1. Kettle is empty. It doesn't matter what time of day, it is always dry. It's like a kitchen gremlin appears throughout the day with the sole purpose of emptying the kettle.

2. Dishcloth smells like feet. This is part of the ongoing dish-drying conundrum. Do you use the paper towel, which is not environmentally responsible, or do you use the dishcloth, which always seems to smell like feet?

3. Charity bin has food rubbish in it. There is always a charity bin somewhere. This in itself is cool, but the fact that they end up with regular trash in them despite looking nothing like a regular bin AND having a huge sign on them is mind boggling.

4. Two or more laminated signs are stuck to the walls.

5. There is a single cutlery item in the sink. The frequency of this suggests that it is not due to user contempt, but rather the group of cutleries are bullies and pick on random teaspoons or knives forcing them to seek refuge in the bottom of the sink.

6. Inside of the microwave looks like a horror movie scene.

7. A furry homemade meal in the fridge: Someone will bring in a money-saving or health-improving home meal, only to let it go full werewolf.

8. Empty mug with teabag on bench: Someone had a plan...

9. The general state of the kitchen is discussed.

10. Kitchen rules somewhere: Every shared kitchen space has seemingly obvious rules, but they rarely inspire action: "Please take your containers home; please wash up your things, please remember to throw out your 18-month-old frozen healthy meal..." and so on.

11. Passive aggressive kitchen rules somewhere: Courteous signage manifests into passive aggression; the "Please remember to wash up your things..." message is inevitably replaced with, "Your mother doesn't work here, so you need to clean up after yourself you little sooky baby..." style gear.

12. Milk smells bad: Somehow even the fresh milk always seems to smell bad.

13. Someone asks you about your weekend.

14. At least one phone zombie: There will be someone in the kitchen who refuses to look up at you from their phone despite you having to do a weird sideways shuffle to get past.

15. Someone has a crisis for you to fix: Even though you only spend four to six minutes in the kitchen per visit, someone will visit you to relay some quasi emergency that couldn't wait.

16. There is an abandoned item in the microwave: Could be a meal, drink, or heat-pack, but either way, is it cool to handle it?